Perhaps this novel should have a warning label underneath the title Warning: may cause you to re-evaluate your life because that was my experience of this masterpiece. The plot is loosely based on the life of Gauguin, a famous painter but even if you are fairly ignorant of his work you can still be deeply moved by this novel. Charles Strickland is a middle aged man with a sound profession and a respectable family. He throws all this away to become an artist. First he goes to Paris where he lives in poverty and squalor and destroys at least two other people who just happen to cross his path then after further misadventures he lands in Tahiti and there he paints his masterpieces. What really made this book for me was the sense that even though Strickland had thrown his life away and lived in appalling poverty and degradation his life was more meaningful and even beautiful as a result than if he had stayed a respectable middle class man. The idea of a life spent pursuing beauty at whatever cost is intoxicating and I've never come across a writer who can convey what this means better than W. Somerset Maugham. Highly recommended.
